Candace Williams Lisle is a litigation attorney and represents individuals, privately held and public companies, and banks in state, federal, and appellate courts. She is also Chair of Phillips Murrah's Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion Committee.

Even though neither of her parents had college degrees, they supported her when she decided to go to law school because of that interest.

Today Lisle is a litigation attorney who represents individuals and companies in court, serving as shareholder and director for Phillips Murrah P.C. She is chairman of the firm's Diversity, Equity and Inclusion Committee, which has implemented diversity externship programs involving the law schools at the University of Oklahoma and Oklahoma City University. Those programs provide the opportunity for diverse law students to gain real-life experiences in the everyday practice of law and be paired with mentor attorneys.

"Firms should strive for workplace diversity, equal opportunity for under-represented constituencies, and inclusivity at all levels because it is the right thing to do. It is a worthy goal that needs no economic justification," Lisle said. "Nevertheless, the business case for a diverse workplace is clear. Many studies have shown that companies with diverse workforces experience more productivity, better problem-solving and decision-making, greater creativity and higher morale and employee engagement. Firms with diverse workforces are more attractive to clients, customers, and prospective talent."

During her career, Lisle has represented clients in litigation matters that included securities fraud, products liability, pharmaceutical and medical devices, labor and employment, bankruptcy adversarial proceedings, real property and title issues and breach-of-contract claims.

In recent years, she has specialized in representing insurance companies in labor and employment law.

She is an active community volunteer and has served as a long-term trustee for both Westminster and Heritage Hall schools, including a term as president of Westminster's board.
